bits. Now, I can't understand that myself at this point. Why? Why? My oldest brother, in the 25th Battalion, was an expert shot with a pistol. He had the highest score at the corps training camp in France, the Canadian Corps. He always carried two guns into action, one in his hand and another in a holster. And he probably killed more men in hand-to-hand combat than anyone else in the Canadian Corps. Now why did he have that lust to kill? It's something that's born in people. I think it goes back to our ancestors. The Germans attacked once without any warning; that is, without a barrage or anything. And they were in our trenches before we knew that they were there. Right in the trenches. The first intimation they had in the officers' quarters was when somebody threw a grenade down the stairway. My brother Bill, he was about six foot one, much bigger than I was. He grabbed a Lewis gun, a machine gun, and came up the steps shooting from the hip. And the Germans shot him through the face on the way up. The bullet went in one side and came out the other side of his nose. And he cleaned out the trench, or most of it, shooting the Lewis gun from the hip. And Morrison Jordan was a sergeant at that time, coming behind with a rifle and bayonet. The two of them cleared the whole trench out. Bill was recommended for a Victoria Cross by the colonel of the 22nd Battalion. But his own battalion commander wouldn't approve it. Bill was a reckless, impetuous person. You never knew what he was going to do next. I remember once watching him.
